

The method to determine valuations for new residential construction is reviewed yearly to approximate current national average construction costs in order to determine actual building permit fees. The following updates the square foot unit cost to calculate the valuation that is applied to the residential permit fee schedule to determine building permit fees. The valuations apply to new residential construction and additions in one- and two-family dwellings, townhomes and accessory structures and apartments. The valuation to determine building permit fees for remodels and renovations remains as the actual bid price. The residential permit fee schedule has been constant for the last 39 years, but to date, the method of determining residential construction valuations still remains significantly short of true and actual valuations.
